Great pains were taken that all of the leaks in the roof were found and stopped. The night after the roof had been pronounced all right and tight there was a hard rain. The next morning a visit was paid to the hotel to find out if the roof was all right, and I was informed that the roof over the room in question had leaked as badly as before. Another visit was paid to the roof. There was a high fire-wall, and the top of it was covered with boards, so as to form a roof to keep off the rain. Then the inside of the fire-wall was covered with clapboards, to keep the brick warm or dry, just which is not known. Upon removing some of the lower clapboards the trouble was discovered. The tinner who put on the (tin) roof had used lead flashings, which extended up about 6 inches. Where the lead extended into the joint in the brick was where the trouble was, as the lead had become loose; there was a crack about 10 feet long that would let in quite a supply of water. The roof of fire wall was about even with the clapboard?, so when it rained, and the wind was from the right direction, the water would be blown in behind the clapboards; then all it had to do was to follow the brick until it came to the crack between the lead flashing and the brick, and then run into the building. The roof was repaired by putting in tin flashings in place of the lead, and that was the last of Curious Roofing Jobs.--Fig. i.--The Water Ran Behind the Clapboards and Under the Tin. the trouble. While it is hardly to be expected that the reader will ever encounter a similar job, yet the above incident shows how easy it is for a person to be deceived...
